Cheetah, Cheetah! (The Cheater Gets Nothing? Not Necessarily.)

Your dirty, no-good, lying, sorry sack of spouse is a CHEATER. Obviously when the Court hears about it and-so will be excoriated and will never show their face again in town. They certainly won't get a

In Mississippi, an Affair is a fault ground for divorce. If your spouse is guilty of an affair it will get don't count on that fact alone meaning you get everything and they get nothing. It does not mean to pay you or that the CHEATER cannot get alimony or even custody.

Back in the olden days, some may say the "Good 'Ol Days", a lady was barred from receiving alimony if guilty of adultery. This is no more, though contributions to the stability and harmony of the marriage and an affair can play a part in what is ultimately received.

Additionally, a spouse having an affair is not barred from being awarded custody. In the olden days an affair could be putting her children at risk. Today, a parent's adultery or morality pursuant to Custody Factors is considered, but an affair with no adverse impact to the child – will not automatically bar the CHEATER will not get custody.

So, cheat with impunity? No. Just know that cheating ain't what it used to be, unless it is.
