

Defending Employers Against Corporate Veil Piercing and Assisting Employers to Tiptoe Out of France

Author: Nicolas C. Sauvage, Partner, Paris

Publication Date: April 21, 2011

U.S. employers with French operations must focus carefully on their investments or divestment operations. Through the "joint employer theory," employees of a French company can now pierce its corporate veil to hold the ultimate parent, even one based in the United States, liable for restructuring costs, including severance packages and damages for unfair dismissal.

The French Supreme Court has set forth three cumulative criteria for a foreign company to be judged a joint employer (Jungheinrich 18 January 2011), and as a result sentenced to pay French personnel liabilities:

- A common management (e.g., someone from the U.S. parent company board catapulted into the chairman position of the French subsidiary)
- A direct or indirect majority stake in the French subsidiary
- A common business carried out by the parent and the subsidiary (obvious notion in an industrial group, but that has been extended to portfolio management for holdings or private equity funds)

It creates a great concern for private equity funds where "top-down" and hands-on control on companies in portfolio is embedded in the business model. So it is for international group holdings. Alas, this is the new battlefield for French employees of U.S. companies.

"Better be a living rat than a dead lion" is the moral of the second breathtaking case (Dunlop Goodyear 1st February 2011): Shutting down a business in France will not be a legitimate reason for massive layoffs.

- First, when a parent company is deemed to be a joint employer - as in the Jungheinrich case - it must itself bring evidence that not only in France but also at the U.S. level, the criteria meriting a French layoff are met (i.e., economic difficulties, technological change, need to salvage the competitiveness of the business line which is threatened on its own market throughout the world).

- And second, because even without the joint employer situation, the Dunlop case tells us that even though the French facilities are incurring losses or seeing their profits decreasing, the judges will scrutinize the group's overall profitability, to bless or curse the concerned reorganization. Because a French company is undergoing huge losses does not mean anymore carte blanche for laying off everyone.

Anticipation will now - more than ever - be critically important. No step can be taken by the foreign parent company to please the banks (refinancing the subsidiary), or the French authorities or local works councils and unions (directly paying the layoffs costs), without a very careful analysis of the consequences. Tiptoeing out of France will be far more efficient and cheaper than roaring at judges and unions.

About Reed Smith

Reed Smith is a global relationship law firm with more than 1,600 lawyers in 23 offices throughout the United States, Europe, Asia and the Middle East.

The information contained herein is intended to be a general guide only and not to be comprehensive, nor to provide legal advice. You should not rely on the information contained herein as if it were legal or other professional advice.

Reed Smith LLP is a limited liability partnership registered in England and Wales with registered number OC303620 and its registered office at The Broadgate Tower, 20 Primrose Street, London EC2A 2RS. Reed Smith LLP is regulated by the Solicitors Regulation Authority. Any reference to the term 'partner' in connection to Reed Smith LLP is a reference to a member of it or an employee of equivalent status.

This Client Alert was compiled up to and including April 2011.

The business carried on from offices in the United States and Germany is carried on by Reed Smith LLP of Delaware, USA; from the other offices is carried on by Reed Smith LLP of England; but in Hong Kong, the business is carried on by Reed Smith Richards Butler. A list of all Partners and employed attorneys as well as their court admissions can be inspected at the website <http://www.reedsmith.com/>.

© Reed Smith LLP 2011. All rights reserved.