Those facing DUI charges in Arizona will probably need to contact a Phoenix DUI attorney, especially if they failed the field sobriety test. Many people find field sobriety tests to be challenging even if they have perfect balance or the stamina of a seasoned athlete. Regardless of the situation, it is very likely that a person will fail a field sobriety test. Therefore, even a person who feels like they are innocent could still be charged with a DUI in Phoenix Arizona. It happens more often that you might think. Take this scenario for example – you are feeling a tad nervous, standing on the side of the road at night and bright headlights are flashing in your eyes all while you are trying to pass a field sobriety test. That is not an easy task for anyone. Field sobriety tests tend to end in failure, and that's why the results may not tell your side of the story accurately. It can be difficult to contest the results of a field sobriety test on your own, especially if you do not have courtroom experience. To make sure that you have a proper defense in court, contact an experienced Phoenix DUI attorney for assistance.
