

TAKING BACK OZ THROUGH BANKRUPTCY LIQUIDATION

By Christine A. Wilton, Esq.

I remember watching the Wizard of Oz movie every Thanksgiving Day as a child growing up here in the southland. After sticking my fingers into the black olives and then eating them from my fingertips and stuffing my belly fully of all the trimmings that make up every traditional holiday meal, the family would then gather around the television and watch the Wizard of Oz. I always looked forward to eating my piece of pumpkin pie with whipped cream while watching this classic film.

Now, as a bankruptcy lawyer, I find myself breaking every illusion I can find about money, the banking system, wall street and the government. Last week, I was pointed to the Secrets of the Wizard of Oz and Our Current Economic Crisis. This article breaks down the symbolism presented in the original book and the movie and explains the entire illusion and how all the systems play a roll in keeping the American people in slavery (Debt).

I see a sequel to this: Dorothy (a babyboomer) is dying and her children take up her cause and become the hero protagonists that lead the munchkins (American public) out of debt and liberate the masses from the wicked witches (banks and wallstreet) through bankruptcy. In order to do this, they must break the illusion that bankruptcy is the worst thing for their credit scores because the masses still believe FICO is really important. They must learn that the only thing their credit score tells them is how well they manage DEBT (how ridiculous is this illusion now?). If there is no individual debt then what importance does their credit score hold?

melted by liquidity

One of Dorothy's children is a bankruptcy lawyer in southern California (I volunteer to be a hero) who, through her blog, continues to break down the walls and expose the lies being told about bankruptcy and one client at a time, she leads the people to FREEDOM (financially speaking). The moral of the story is that the banks won't win in the end and the monetary system as we know will implode if the Wizard does not retire and if we don't kill the Wicked Witch of the East (again).

Bankruptcy is a valuable tool that dates back to the Bible. Financial freedom from debts permanently is the level of transformation that is needed here. If the American people take back Oz by refusing to do business with them (Mastercard and Visa) then they will "melt."
