How does an attorney determine which is the best fit for their particular situation?

...By getting organized!

First and foremost, an attorney should create a list of the factors that they feel are important.

Is budget an issue?

If so, then comparing the costs for various Houston court reporting services should be on the attorney's list.

Are scheduling and logistical considerations important?

Determining the ability of the court report service to take depositions when and where the case requires is something the attorney should clear up early in the decision-making process.

What services and technological support are required?

For most attorneys these days, the ability of the court reporter to provide cutting edge tools like Realtime reporting, online case repositories for storing transcripts and more can make an attorney's job easier and allow them to provide better value to their clients. If the attorney knows that they will need to share transcripts with other members of their legal team, a court reporting services company that provides depositions streaming, videoconferencing and mobile application support is probably the right direction to consider.

How experienced is the court reporter?

Does the court reporting firm have experience providing the services required? Does the Houston court reporting firm have a strong deposition services background in specific areas that could prove beneficial to the attorney in this case?

References are important

When it comes to choosing the right Houston court reporter, the right references go a long way. Make sure the court reporting services you are targeting provide proper references, and follow up on those references to ensure that they all check out.

All of these areas are important, but only the attorney can determine which are "most important" for their individual needs. Once that list has been prioritized, it simply becomes a matter of applying that list to the individual court reporters and court reporting firms in the Houston area to figure out which litigation services company is the best fit.
