Chapter 7 bankruptcy exemptions determine whether you get to keep your home, car, pension, personal belongings, or other property. If a certain item is exempt, you may keep it during and after bankruptcy. If it is not exempt, the bankruptcy trustee is allowed to sell the property to pay your unsecured creditors. Chapter 13 bankruptcy exemptions determine how much you will have to pay to nonpriority, unsecured creditors through your Chapter 13 plan.

If you are considering bankruptcy, it's important to understand how exemptions work and learn what property is exempt in your state. Some states offer you a choice between their State exemptions and the Federal bankruptcy exemptions.

Other states require you to use their state exemptions. Some states have special exemptions that apply specifically to bankruptcy, while others apply exemption laws that affect any kind of court-ordered collection activity. These statutes are drafted in "legal speak." Also, most states do not list their exemptions in a neat little table like the common ones listed below. You should check the actual citations for specific limitations or qualifications or updates of these exemptions as they are updated by administrative order and this may happen at any time. Further, when an administrative order is written, the numbers in the statute are old, and don't match current amounts of the new relevant exemptions. The below exemptions are not meant to be a comprehensive list for Arizona, but meant to indicate some of the most commonly used.

Debtors may claim a homestead exemption in up to $150,000 of equity in the real property upon which the debtor's house sits, condo or co-op, a mobile home in which the debtor resides and the land upon which the mobile home is located A.R.S. § 33-1101.
