Are Women Business Owners at a Disadvantage to Men?

By: Donna Ray Chmura. This was posted Monday, August 23rd, 2010

Do women business-owners really have less access to capital than men?

I was reading this article exploring the reasons why women business owners have less access to venture capital than male business owners do. The data shouldn't have surprised me, but they did.

I have been a woman in male-dominated areas since 1985 when I was a female sports reporter (and later the sports editor) for The Daily Northwestern student-run newspaper.

I remember feeling like the only woman at a Big Ten Conference basketball press conference who wasn't a wife or secretary. When I asked a question, everyone turned around in surprise at the sound of my voice. I remember a local news crew filming me in the football locker room post-game press conference, as if I were the news for just being in there.

I am now a business attorney — one of only two women attorneys in the 24 business attorneys at Sands Anderson. Most of the attorneys I negotiate transactions against are men. Many, although not all, of my clients are men. I work with male accountants, financial advisors and bankers. I don't think about gender at all.

I forgot how hard women struggled to vote, to own property in their own names, have professional opportunities and to be taken seriously in the business world. Then an article like this comes along to remind me that there are still struggles in day-to-day business life.

As a woman business owner in North Carolina, what experiences have you had being taken seriously, having access to credit and competing in business?
